CRYPTOCURRENCY TRADING

"Cryptocurrency markets are decentralized, meaning they are not issued or regulated by any central authority, such as a government. Instead, transactions are processed across a global network of computers. Cryptocurrencies can be bought and sold through exchanges and stored in digital wallets. It is important to note that crypto assets held on exchanges or in wallets are not insured by the FDIC, unlike funds held in traditional bank accounts. Therefore, it's essential to trade and store your cryptocurrencies on platforms that prioritize strong security measures—such as maintaining a significant portion of assets in cold storage and offering two-factor authentication for users."

"On a blockchain, mining refers to the process of validating transactions. In return for their computational efforts, successful miners are rewarded with newly minted cryptocurrency. This incentive not only facilitates the secure processing of transactions but also helps offset transaction fees. Over time, mining efficiency has significantly improved with the use of specialized hardware, such as FPGAs and ASICs, which run advanced hashing algorithms like SHA-256 and Scrypt to generate hashes and validate transactions at a much faster rate."
